

Editor's Remarks

---

I am pleased to introduce this special issue, guest edited by Robert Shepherd and Kathryn Graham. The guest editors have assembled a number of important contributions for this volume, which provide a legal and epistemological framing for evaluating in Indigenous contexts as well as examples of how this translates into practice. There is still much to learn and to construct in this domain of evaluation, and Shepherd and Graham articulate quite clearly what actions are needed to advance our collective knowledge and practice. I extend my heartfelt thanks to the guest editors, authors, and reviewers who made this special issue possible, and I hope that our readers take away its important messages.
